A Cure For Blindness—Or Something Else?

Twenty-four-year-old Audra Carter, a popular deejay in Manhattan, won't let mere blindness keep her from living life her way, sometimes even riding her bicycle through town, relying on her keen hearing and uncanny instincts to guide her. Her father, Jenson Carter, is a neuroscientist who has devoted his career to finding a cure for her particular form of blindness. He now believes he has. With a number of test subjects, including Audra, Jenson takes his research to the next level, only to face apparent failure. A few months following the failed procedure, Jenson, the NYC Police, the DEA, and the FBI are alarmed by a string of bizarre deaths involving the test subjects. Jensen is blamed for those deaths, and fears his experiment was hijacked.

Audra is kidnapped! As Jenson races to discover the truth and save his daughter, he must avoid the FBI. Audra struggles with her captors while dealing with a new and dangerous kind of sight: darksight. Audra must master her mysterious darksight vision, and fight the oncoming “side effects” to keep them both alive.

Meet DC Mallery

DC Mallery is a writer of suspense/thrillers, screenplays, and other works, as well as short fiction primarily in the horror and science fiction genres. His short fiction, The Trauma Eater, appeared in Sanitarium Magazine, Ellie was published in Lamplight, a quarterly magazine of dark fiction, and Fireworks and a Kiss at the End of Time appears in Bards and Sages Quarterly. His screenplay, Emergence, was awarded second place for Feature Screenplay at the 2018 Vision Festival. His science thriller, Darksight, will be published by Black Opal Books in June 2019. He is now hard at work writing his next novel: The Dying Half.

DC Mallery is also an avid traveler. He has gone ice climbing in Alaska, bug-swatting in Greenland, and has been trapped in the innermost sanctum of the Great Pyramid of Giza when the power went out (inexplicably and for a distressingly long period of time).

He has degrees in Astronomy, Physics and the Law and calls Los Angeles his home. Visit him at DCMallery.com or follow him on Twitter.
